Spreading a Business Bill, Explained

Credicorp Slice turns one specific business bill into 3 or 4 equal weekly instalments for a single flat fee — no compounding, no interest meter running. This paper sets out exactly how it works.

What Slice is

Slice is bill-shaped finance: it attaches to a specific cost — an insurance premium, a tax bill, a stock order, an equipment invoice — rather than giving the company a general balance to spend.

Credicorp Slice at a glance

- Bill size covered: £50 to £2,000
- Instalments: 3 or 4, spaced 7 days apart
- Fee: one flat 6% of the bill, charged once — no compounding interest
- Fees cap: total fees capped at 100% of the bill
- Late fee: £12 per missed instalment
- Security and guarantees: unsecured; no personal guarantee

Worked example

A £1,000 software renewal split over 4 instalments: fee £60, total £1,060, paid as four weekly instalments of £265. The cost is known on day one and never grows with time.

When flat-fee instalments beat a daily-interest loan

- The cost is fixed and known — you are buying certainty, not time.
- The bill is larger than a micro-loan comfortably covers (Slice reaches £2,000).
- You want the discipline of a fixed 3–4 week payoff rather than an open balance.

For a single unpredictable-length gap, compare against the daily-interest Business Loan at https://credicorp.co.uk/compare/ — early repayment makes the loan cheaper for very short gaps, while Slice wins on certainty.

Eligibility and application

UK limited companies and LLPs trading 6+ months with a UK business bank account; no personal guarantee, nothing on a director's personal credit file. Apply at https://credicorp.co.uk/apply/.
